The nun who helped build St. Joseph's Healthcare into the respected teaching hospital it is today has died.

Sister Joan O'Sullivan led St. Joseph's from 1979 to 1988 — a time when few women headed hospitals.

"I can't remember too many women in CEO positions of hospitals at that time," said Brian Guest, senior vice-president of corporate renewal and mission at St. Joseph's Health System. "She was a trailblazer."

Under her watch, St. Joseph's went through $60 million to $80 million of redevelopment including rebuilding the obstetrics department despite uncertainty about how to fund it. She also created the busy urgent care centre in Stoney Creek.

"It was a pretty courageous decision," said Guest. "That was a challenging time to get the funding in place. In terms of where St. Joseph's is now, the community owes a lot to her."

One of her biggest accomplishments was starting St. Joseph's international outreach, which provides health care and medical training to impoverished parts of the world, such as Haiti and Uganda.

"She was responsible for starting that long before international work was on everyone's mind," said Sister Anne Anderson, her friend of 50 years.

One of O'Sullivan's most difficult times as head of the hospital was when it was recovering from a major fire on May 1, 1980.

"She really worked at reorganizing, rebuilding and reinvigorating the place," said Anderson.

Before becoming executive director, she led St. Joseph's nursing school from 1964 to 1972. She was also assistant executive director of St. Joseph's Hospital in Brantford and CEO of St. Mary's General Hospital in Kitchener.

"She mentored generations of nurses, and then when she moved into senior administration she administered generations of young administrators," said Anderson.

She was such a good leader, because she showed respect to all the staff, no matter what role they played in the hospital.

"I knew her as an emergency department orderly and as a vice-president, and I can honestly say she treated me no differently in the two roles," said Guest. "That's why she was so beloved. She saw everyone in the hospital as part of the team, no matter where you worked and inspired loyalty and commitment to the mission."

Despite her high profile, she was humble and shied away from the limelight.

"She was a very calm influence," said Guest. "But she had a look — you knew in a hurry when you weren't meeting expectations."

She remained committed to bettering Hamilton's health care until she died April 27 at the Sisters of St. Joseph Motherhouse at age 91.

"She truly believed with every fibre of her being that it is an honour to serve the sick," said Anderson. "I was keeping her very up-to-date on the new St. Joseph's West 5th site, and she was delighted to think that mental health care was going to take on such an amazing and dramatic transformation. Until her dying day, she was interested in the care of the people of Hamilton. That's her greatest legacy."

Lovingly known as "Joan O," she was a sister of St. Joseph's for 67 years. Anderson said she loved dogs of all kinds — "anything with four feet and a wagging tail."

"Her faith was the anchor that kept her rooted, active and interested," said Anderson. "Her loss certainly will leave a great void in the congregation, but her memory will be a great joy. The tone at the Motherhouse is that we are all profoundly grateful for a life well lived."
